The hallmark of psychodynamic and psychoanalytic treatment is a focus on psychological patterns and processes that underlie overt symptoms—in other words, personality dynamics. In the morning lecture, “Personality Pathways to Depression,” Dr. Shedler will discuss the personality styles and syndromes most often seen in clinical practice (e.g., narcissistic, borderline, obsessive-compulsive), describe how each personality style represents a unique pathway to “depression” that requires a distinct treatment focus, and offer clinical strategies for deepening treatment.

Building on concepts from the morning lecture, the afternoon workshop will have a practical, hands-on clinical focus. Participants will develop a deeper appreciation of contemporary psychoanalytic/psychodynamic therapy through clinical case presentations by workshop participants, with case discussion, “live” clinical supervision, and role playing to demonstrate effective intervention. Dr. Shedler will emphasize personality dynamics and the constructive use of transference and countertransference to facilitate change.

OBJECTIVES
1. Understand how familiar personality styles represent distinct pathways to depressive disorders.
2. Describe how narcissistic, paranoid, and borderline personality styles create psychological vulnerability to depression.
3. Describe the defining features of depressive personality disorder and implications for treatment.
4. Develop a deeper understanding of the clinical treatment process through case discussion, role play, and live clinical supervision.
